Czech Yearbook of International Law. Vol. 9. International Organisations / ed. A.J. Belohlavek, N. Rozehnalova. – Nether–ands : Lex Lata, 2018. - XVI, 438 p. - ISBN 978-90-824603-7-7.

The role of private international law has become all but inseparable from the area of international politics (and international public law as an instrument of international politics) – while there are fundamental differences between the two areas in terms of their sources, in conceptual and systematical terms, and in terms of their function, the goals that they pursue nonetheless intermingle or supplement one another in a great number of cases. After all, examples of their mutual interaction can be encountered on a daily basis, almost everywhere we look.

The idea of the editors was to establish a first journal published in English language dedicated to the international in all of its incarnations as the Czech Republic has a number of excellent scholars in the area of international law (both public international law and private international law) who produce, within the context of various professional, scientific, and pedagogical projects (and at their intersection with legal practice) top-quality work, but there was currently no forum of adequate quality to present this work to the world at large.
